

I live in Metro Atlanta where traffic can come to a standstill at any time and under any circumstance
Having to scan the dial and coming across some traffic reports of some parts of the city at twenty minute intervals usually means that I am stuck before I have a chance to avoid the area.

Not only is this annoying, but I am sure it hampers emergency services from being able to give assistance in a timely manner.

There comes a time when circumstances change and long held traditions must change or die.

The local radio broadcasters are unable (through no real fault of their own) to provide this public service to the degree that is now necessary in the 21st Century.

Satellite radio can fill that public need.

I urge you allow satellite radio to bring the information we need.

Sincerely,

Jim Philpot
